Elon Musk replaces the Twitter logo with “X”

Elon Musk has finally got his way. First he bought out Twitter, “tinkered” with its features and now he has changed its name and logo. Are we facing the final days of the Twitter we know or is this just the start of a new era? Only time will tell.

Elon Musk has erased the corporate image of Twitter, the famous blue bird, and has replaced it with an X. The change was first noticed by users after Musk tweeted a new logo. The logo appears to be a combination of the Twitter bird and the X, which is already the symbol for the global cryptocurrency.

According to Twitter's Support account, the change is not related to any technical issue but rather to Musk's personal profile picture, in all of Twitter's accounts. The new logo is visible on the Twitter website, the Twitter app, WhatsApp, Telegram, and the desktop version.

The logo change is not the only one that has happened. Musk has also changed the name of the domain. The old domain, Twitter.com, has been replaced with X.com. The new domain site is currently under construction, showing only the new logo and a message that says, “Welcome to the new X. Follow us on Twitter.”

The change has been met with mixed reactions. Some users are excited about the new logo and name, seeing it as a sign of change and progress. Others are concerned about the future of Twitter and its mission.

“Twitter (X) are better because the old name was bad,” said one user.
